Puyeo, together with Xiong-nu and Koguryeo, was regarded as a potential menace to Wang Mang’s short-lived (8-23 AD) Xin dynasty. The first recorded instance of the Puyeo king sending envoys to the Later Han court was 49 AD. The Dongyi-zhuan (of San-guo-zhi) gives a 930-letter description of Puyeo as of the late third century. It is the first systematic history on Puyeo appearing in the Chinese dynastic chronicles. The following is a summary.

Puyeo borders Xianbei in the west, Yilou in the east, Koguryeo in the south, and Nen-jiang (Nonni River) in the north. Among the Eastern Barbarians, only the Puyeo occupies the great plain, raising grains and livestock. The elders say that their ancestors (from Gori, according to the foundation myth) took refuge in this Ye-maek land a long time ago. Precious jade artifacts are handed down from generation to generation in the royal house. [It reminds us of the Hong-shan jade tradition.] Government officials are designated after livestock such as horse-ka[n], cow-ka[n], pig-ka[n] and dog-ka[n], the lower official being in charge of several hundred households and the higher one several thousand. When holding rites to the Heavens in January, they drink, sing and dance every day. They offer drinking cups to each other and ceremonially wash every cup. Since every one keeps singing on the road, the sounds of singing can be heard all day long. [They surely have enjoyed the modern-day Kara-oke!] They adore white clothes, wearing caps decorated with gold and silver, jackets with large sleeves, trousers and leather shoes. Like the Xiong-nu, when an elder brother dies, the younger one takes his wife. Keeping armor and weapons in each house, all those ka people [the aristocratic clans] engage in fighting, while the lower classes supply food for them. They bury the living, sometimes amounting to a hundred people, with the dead. As the Xianbei and Koguryeo became stronger during the last years of the Later Han dynasty, the Gong-sun ruler married a daughter of his family member to the king of Puyeo.2

1 See Lee (1984: 21-22)

The Dongyi-zhuan also gives a brief description of the Yilou. The Yilou are the descendants of Sushen people [and the ancestors of the Mohe and Ruzhen people]. Yilou is located in the mountainous forest region northeast of Puyeo that reaches the ocean. They look similar to the Puyeo people, but their language is different from that of Puyeo and Koguryeo. They produce grains, cows, horses, and hemp. They are very strong and courageous. Each village has a chieftain but they do not have a king. They always live in the forest, enduring a much colder climate than Puyeo. They raise pigs for food, and use pig skin for clothes and pig fats to grease their body in winter for protection against wind and cold. They use long bows which are as powerful as crossbows, apply poison on the (blue) stone arrowheads, and shoot arrows with deadly accurate marksmanship. They were the subjects of Puyeo since the time of the Han dynasty. As the Puyeo exacted heavy taxes and corvée, they rebelled in 220-226. The Puyeo made quite a few punitive expeditions against the Yilou, but could not subjugate them because, though the Yilou were small in number, they dwelt in extremely rugged forest difficult to penetrate.3

The above records give a brief but rather clear idea of the ancient relationship between the Yemaek Tungus and the Mohe-Ruzhen Tungus. According to the Dongyi-zhuan, the language of Koguryeo was identical to that of the Puyeo, but these two languages were different from the language of Yilou people who were the descendants of Sushen. If the Chinese
In Koguryeo, the hereditary warrior aristocracy did not work in the fields but devoted itself to training for combat, pursuing periodic raiding of neighbors and extracting regular tributes in order to supplement the deficient resources that could be acquired from its own mountainous terrain. Koguryeo allowed the conquered tribal chieftains to retain their authority and levied tribute through them. The conquered Ok-cheo people carried cloth, fish, salt, and other local products on their backs to Koguryeo, over a distance of more than 200 miles.

5 “Attacks launched on Chinese installations and officials by the king of Koguryeo in AD 106 forced a withdrawal of Han authority to the west, near the commandery of Liao-dong … About 175 a separatist regime was established … by Gong-sun du …

His strength and degree of independence were such that he could require acknowledgement records were correct, the language of the Ye-maek Tungus in central Manchuria must have been substantially different from that of the Mohe-Ruzhen Tungus of eastern Manchuria.

In 285, Murong Hui invaded Puyeo, prompting the king to commit suicide. In 346, Murong Huang took the Puyeo king and over 50,000 of his people prisoner. Upon the extinction of the Xianbei state of Former Yan in 370, Puyeo passed under the protection of Koguryeo. Subsequently, with the rise of the Mohe people, the Puyeo royal house was driven from its ancient territory and surrendered itself to Koguryeo in 494, completely extinguishing its existence.

The area where the Song-hua River and the Nen-jiang come together is the best agricultural land, and it is a continuation of the Liao region, as the drainages are separated by only low hills. The entire area constitutes the vast Dongbei Plain. According to Di Cosmo (2002: 72), a rich inventory of iron knives, daggers, and armor dated to the ninth century BC were found along the Amur River, and “there are indications that relations existed between Transbaikalia and the Chinese northeast, possibly following the ancient routes of communication through the forests of Manchuria and on the large waterways that run north to south: the Song-hua, Nonni, and Liao Rivers.”

The Dongyi-zhuan also gives a brief description of Koguryeo. Being located in a mountainous valley, Koguryeo is always short of foodstuffs. The Koguryeo people are quick tempered and ferocious, and fond of pillaging. Their language and customs are similar to those of Puyeo, but their clothing and temperament are somewhat different. Their king comes from one of the five aristocratic clans, and always takes his queen from a specific clan. The ruling clans never work in the fields, and the lower classes supply them with foodstuffs. They enjoy singing and dancing every night, and hold rites to Heaven in October. They construct tombs by piling up stones, spending enormous resources. They are strong and adept in warfare, producing excellent bows and conquering all the Ye-maek people. Their horses are small and adept at climbing mountains. Wang Mang attempted to use the Koguryeo troops to attack the Xiong-nu, but the Koguryeo soldiers merely plundered local provinces. During the second century (125-67 AD), Koguryeo frequently invaded Liao-dong. On its way to attack Xian-ping—an attack recorded, but without a specific date, in the Dongyi-zhuan records—the Koguryeo army killed the Governor of Dai-fang and captured the wife and children of the Governor of Le-lang. In 242, King Dong-cheon (227-48) of Koguryeo pillaged Xian-ping. Xian-ping was the place where the Liao dynasty established its Supreme Capital.

In 204, Le-lang passed into the hands of a warlord family named Gong-sun, which had consolidated power in the Liao-dong, and established the Dai-fang commandery some time between 204 and 220 out of the southern portion of Le-lang. Koguryeo started fighting against the independent Gong-sun rulers. In 237, the Gong-sun ruler proclaimed himself the king of Yan. According to the Dongyi-zhuan, when the (Cao Cao’s) Wei army attacked the Gong-sun in 238, the Koguryeo king dispatched several thousand soldiers and helped the Wei army. The Le-lang and Dai-fang commanderies were taken over by the Cao Cao’s Wei (220-265), and then by the Western Jin (265-316).

In Puyeo and Koguryeo, kings were at first chosen by some sort of elective process, a la the Xianbei tradition, alternating the kingship among important clan leaders. (The same practice appeared also in Silla.) Furthermore, even when the right to the throne became permanently secured by a single royal clan, the system of succession was often lateral. Upon the death of King Koguk-chon in 197, his younger brother married the widowed queen and became King San-sang. The marriage to sister-in-law originated from the custom of Puyeo and Xiong-nu.

In Puyeo, the shift to lineal succession is suggested by the records of the King Ui-ryo (?-285 AD) succeeding his father on the throne at the age of six. The father-to-son succession is recorded in Koguryeo from the reign of King San-sang (197-227 AD). Even then, the queen was drawn from an important non-royal ruling clan. The political authority often lay in the hands of the senior members of the royal clan or of the aristocratic clan from which the queens were drawn. The Puyeo and the Koguryeo were not nomads, and yet somehow they had retained nomadic social formations of a martial outlook and maintained an aristocratic class whose main occupation had been the practice of war (cf. Di Cosmo, 2002, p. 43).

During the third century, Koguryeo was still entrenched in the Hun-Yalu river valleys. In the late third century, the Murong tribe of Xianbei moved down into the Liao River basin and cut off Le-lang from the Jin empire. The Samguk-sagi records frequent armed conflicts between the Koguryeo and the Murong Xianbei from 293 to 296.

According to the Jin-shu, Murong Hui’s ancestors had lived for generations among the Northern Barbarians, and they were called Dong-hu. At the beginning of the Wei Dynasty (220-65), Murong Hui’s great-grandfather led all his subjects into Liao-xi and settled there. We do not know why Hui’s father decided to leave Liao-xi and to move into the north of Liao-dong. When he died in the year 283, his younger brother Shan took over the leadership. In 285, Shan was killed by his subjects and the people proclaimed Hui as their chieftain. Murong Hui invaded Puyeo in 285, prompting the king to commit suicide.

In 311, the Xiong-nu sacked the Jin capital at Luoyang, and Koguryeo took over the Le-lang commandery in 313. In 319, Koguryeo, in coalition with two Xianbei tribes, the Yu-wen and the Duan, attacked Murong Hui (r.285-333), but was defeated by the troops led by Hui and his heir apparent Huang. Huang was the second son of Hui and the first son of Hui’s legitimate wife who was a former princess of the Duan. Hui let another son defend Liao-dong. In 320, the Koguryeo army attacked Liao-dong but was beaten back.

The armed conflicts between the Xianbei and Koguryeo continued from 339 to 343. The Zi-zhi-tong-jian records the advice of Murong Han given to Huang (r.333-349).

“Our nearest neighbors, the Koguryeo, are always vigilant. They know that as soon as we have annihilated the Yu-wen, we will attack them. Therefore, if we move to invade the territory of Yu-wen, they surely would attack our country while our army is abroad. Were we to leave a few of our troops to guard the home country, the army of Koguryeo would ravage the country. Were we to leave a sufficient number of troops to prevent an invasion, our expeditionary army would be too weak to conquer the Yu-wen. We should, therefore, first conquer Koguryeo.” Huang invaded Koguryeo in 342-3 with forty thousand of his elite soldiers, and captured its capital Hwan-do.
At that time, Huang was further advised by one of his generals:
“It is impossible to keep Koguryeo occupied. The king managed to escape and the people are scattered and hidden in the mountains. Upon our departure they will emerge from their hiding places and gather together. Let us take Chao’s mother along as prisoner, and remove the corpse of his father to Long-cheng. Under such circumstances Chao [King Ko-guk-won] will beg for the restoration of his parents. Then you may return the corpse of his father and may treat Chao with kindness and give him your confidence. In my opinion this is the best way of handling Koguryeo.” Huang gave his consent.10

We see the replay of an intimate relationship (i.e., armed conflicts) between the Mongolic Xianbei and Ye-maek Tungus.11 The name of the Ye-maek Tungus antagonist changed from Chosun to Koguryeo, but the name of the Xianbei opponent stayed identical, “Yan.”

According to Farris (1998: 77), the Xianbei learned to use the stirrup c. 300 (at first slung over only the left side of the animal), and “the first Koreans to use the horse in combat were soldiers of Koguryeo doing battle with the Xianbei.” The technique of using stirrups seems to have entered the Korean peninsula courtesy of the incessant fighting between the Xianbei and Koguryeo. It is interesting to recall that iron-making technology was also transferred through the armed conflicts between the Old Yan and Old Chosun around 400 BC.

The incessant fighting between the Mongolic Xianbei and Ye-maek Tungus seems to have generated a strong enough cultural assimilation between these two peoples as to find in the History of Liao the statement that the Oidan Liao, the descendants the Xianbei, had originated from the old Chosun land, having the identical customs and tradition of “the Ki-ja (Ji-ji)’s Eight Clauses of Instruction” as the Chosun.12

According to the Ye Section of Dong-yi Zhuan, Ki-ja (Ji-zi) in Chosun had formulated the Eight Clauses of Instruction and educated the people. The Ye Section further records that, about forty generations after Ki-ja
[c. 323 BC, when the ruler of Yan assumed the title of king],
the Lord of Chosun, named Jun, arrogated kingship to himself.

3. Koguryeo Tomb Painting
Duck-heung-ri, Kang-seo

BIBLIOGRAPHY

src/hong@wontackhong.pe.kr
© 2005 by Wontack Hong
All rights reserved